Jayber Crow is an octogenarian barber who sits under the poplars that hedge in his cabin and stares at the reflections on the river water that is always running somewhere, with time floating in swirls of memories of a life fully lived and now suddenly gone, its light extinguished from within. And yet, this very same river erodes the hills and pastures that have crowned Jayber's home since the beginning of times as if to remind him that everything changes so that the essential remains the same.

Wendell Berry's Jayber Crow. Martha Greene Eads. Students at the university where I teach are, for the most part, willing to suffer (at least a little) for the sake of the environment. In support of campus efforts to "go green," many students report taking shorter showers than they took at home as high schoolers.

Suffering Unto Salvation in Wendell Berry's Jayber Crow

Title characters from Berry's earlier Port William volumes — Jayber Crow, Old Jack, Hannah Coulter — appear here in affectionate cameos as the adult Andy, echoing Wordsworth, observes that "in my memory, all who were there ... seem now to be gathered into a love that is at once a boy's and an aging man's."

Wendell Berry - Wikipedia

In The Humane Vision of Wendell Berry Anthony Esolen notes that Berry's longest Port William novel, Jayber Crow, is in many ways a modern day retelling of Dante. Berry's own language throughout the book suggests the comparison, as his narrator, the novel's subject and namesake, makes frequent mention of "the Dark Wood of Error."
